

HOPPY THOUGHTS

A little zine of frog logic, for brains that work sideways

FROG LOGIC OFFICIAL

A NOTE BEFORE YOU HOP IN

Welcome to the pond

This is a small collection of frog-themed jokes, one-liners, and gentle truths for anyone whose brain runs a little differently. Read it front to back, or just flip to whatever lily pad calls to you.

On Focus (Or the Lack Thereof) pg 03

On Executive Function pg 04

On Sensory Everything pg 05

On Social Battery pg 06

On Rest & Self-Compassion pg 07

Froggy Affirmations to Close On pg 08

CHAPTER ONE

On Focus (Or the Lack Thereof)

For the brains that chase every dragonfly that flies by.

My attention span isn't short. It's just a very good multitasking lily pad — hopping between seventeen things at once.

I opened four tabs to look something up and now I'm reading about the mating habits of tree frogs. No regrets.

Hyperfocus is just my brain deciding this ONE lily pad is the only lily pad that exists today.

They say "stay on task." I say "the task is now three tasks and one of them is snacks."

My brain doesn't wander. It free-ranges.

CHAPTER TWO

On Executive Function

Because knowing what to do and doing it are two very different ponds.

I have a to-do list, a "to-do eventually" list, and a "to-do if a miracle occurs" list. All equally important.

Starting the dishes requires the same activation energy as starting a small country.

I didn't forget. My brain just filed it under "later" and later never RSVP'd.

Task paralysis: when you have five things to do and your brain picks "lie very still" instead.

Somewhere between "I'll do it in five minutes" and "it's been three hours" lives my entire personality.

CHAPTER THREE

On Sensory Everything

For the ones who can hear the fridge hum from two rooms away.

My favorite outfit is "soft, tagless, and doesn't touch my neck."

I'm not being dramatic, that light is genuinely too loud.

Frogs breathe through their skin. I relate — I also absorb the entire emotional weather of a room the second I walk in.

Noise-canceling headphones: the closest thing I have to a lily pad of my very own.

There is a very specific sock seam that has ruined my entire morning. It's happened before. It will happen again.

CHAPTER FOUR

On Social Battery

Frogs are famously loud for about twenty minutes, then need total silence. Iconic, honestly.

I had a lovely time at the gathering and now I need to lie in a dark room like a recovering pond creature.

"Just one more errand" is how legends disappear.

My social battery has two settings: full croak chorus, or completely submerged and unreachable.

Texting back in 3 days isn't neglect, it's a respectful hibernation period.

I love my people dearly and also I would like everyone to leave, please, with love.

CHAPTER FIVE

On Rest & Self-Compassion

A slightly softer chapter, because we've earned it.

Frogs spend most of winter doing absolutely nothing at the bottom of a pond. Genuinely the most inspiring life plan I've seen.

Productive and worthy are not the same word, no matter what my browser history of self-help articles implies.

I did one (1) thing today and I would like a small parade.

You don't have to earn your rest by being exhausted first. Rest is allowed on a whim, like a frog deciding to just... sit there.

Slow days are still days. Ponds don't apologize for being still.

BEFORE YOU GO

Froggy Affirmations to Close On

Take whichever one your brain needs today. Leave the rest on the lily pad.

My pace is not a flaw. It's just my pace.

I am allowed to do things the roundabout way.

Small hops still move me across the pond.

I don't have to understand my brain to be kind to it.

Today's version of "enough" counts, whatever size it is.

Thanks for hopping through. More froggy things at Frog Logic.